The death of Clark Prescott Bissett, Professor Emeritus of the University of Washington, at La Jolla, California, on January 9, 1932, marks the passing of a man distinguished for his lovable and inspiring personality, for his untiring devotion to and friendly interest in his students, colleagues and associates, and for his unselfish public service.

A member of the Law School faculty since 1912, on two occasions he served as acting dean. As a teacher he was beloved by his students and held in esteem by his colleagues on the faculty. As a public speaker he had few peers and his unselfishness in responding to the many demands for such services undoubtedly took its toll in a shortened life.

He was a great admirer of Abraham Lincoln and collected a nationally known library of Lincolniana. His loving enthusiasm and unremitting study led to frequent lectures and the eventual publication of several works on that great American.

His life has been an inspiration and his loss will be felt by all.

Pages 117-126, inclusive, of an article on “Judicial Control Over the Sufficiency of the Evidence in Jury Trials,” by Stanley B. Long, in 4 Washington Law Review, 117, should have been, in large part, in quotation marks and the source of the material, an article in 24 Columbia Law Review, entitled, “The Power of a Judge to Direct a Verdict”, by Dean Young B. Smith, acknowledged.

The author of the article makes this acknowledgement of the source of the material, and both he and the Review regret that in the manuscript and in the process of re-editing the error occurred, and that it was not sooner called to the attention of the editor.
