FOREWORD

Jacob Walker[†]

The staff of the Washington International Law Journal presents the second installment of Volume 32. Until recently, the Washington International Law Journal was the Pacific Rim Law & Policy Journal and was limited to the Pacific Rim and related law and policy. The Journal's scope expanded in Volume 24 to include all international, foreign, and comparative law topics. This issue seeks to further implement this expansion with articles and comments addressing a wide range of international and foreign law topics.

In Volume 32, Issue 2, readers will explore a range of topics from the legality of unilateral sanctions in international diplomacy to international taxation of global workers during COVID. This issue begins with Seyed Mohsen Rowhani's exploration of how international human rights laws are impacted when states implement unilateral sanctions, and when sanctioning states should be held liable for violating customary international law.

In addition to these articles, this issue concludes with a student comment from the University of Washington School of Law. Kate Moyer examines COVID-19 relief measures and how those measures impacted international taxation individuals who lived, worked, and were locked down overseas during the pandemic.

The Washington International Law Journal relies on the support of scholars, donors, and the University of Washington to publish legal scholarship at the forefront of international law. On behalf of the Volume 32 Executive Board, I would like to thank University of Washington School of Law's Professor Scott Schumacher and Associate Dean Mary Hotchkiss for their continued support of the Journal. I would also like to thank Professors Dongsheng Zang and Clark Lombardi for their guidance over the course of this year, especially for providing invaluable insight into improving our editing processes and connection with the law school.

We are proud to present our readers with this compilation of foreign and international law scholarship. With that, we present the second issue of Volume 32.

[†] Jacob Walker is the Editor-in-Chief of the Washington International Law Journal. He is a J.D. candidate at the University of Washington School of Law.
